As the Downtown Art Walk grew in popularity over the past year, so did unrelated activities like a large craft show and, of course, food trucks. Well, it looks like Main Street, which has turned into food truck alley on the second Thursday of the month, will remain empty of some trucks.

"Don Chow Tacos, @fishlips_sushi, and @indiajonesct got the boot from Main st. They said the property owners don't want us tonight," tweeted Don Chow. Nom Nom Truck added: "Just got kicked out of spot :(we will keep you posted on our next location!" They moved one block over to Spring Street, joining the Grilled Cheese Truck, Marked 5 and Coohaus.

It is unclear who forced the trucks to leave, but according to Raw Materials, an art materials store, there are "No Parking" signs lining Main between 4th and 6th.

Update: "Official word from the cops is that a large property owner doesn't want the trucks on Main St. Will tweet ot more 411 if I hear anything," Don Chow Tacos later tweeted.

I wasn't aware that 'what a large property owner wants' means something is law.

Wow, you didn't have to worry about parking any where downtown after 7 PM before. The parking patrol went home.

I guess that's one of the costs of DT becoming "the trendy place to live".

The owners of Nickel Diner came out and applauded gleefully and chatted with cops as they sent the trucks away. It could well have been them since they're one of the few businesses on that block. It really upset me especially since Nickel Diner has always prided itself as a place to help "bring back" downtown.

One day a month there are some food trucks that bring more business to the area and ultimately them. It's a shame to see them act like that.

I expressed this to them and said that I wasn't gonna be eating there anymore. shame.

Booooo!! I like not having to chase trucks around the city. Once a month they all come to DTLA. Did not know they relocated to Spring and we ended up at Cole's. It was great as usual, but was really looking forward to Grilled Cheese truck.
